

The Pickwick Club, so renowned in the annals of Huggin Lane, and so closely entwined with the thousand interesting associations connected with Lothbury and Cateaton Street, was founded in the year One Thousand Eight Hundred and Twentytwo, by Mr. Samuel Pickwick the great traveller, whose fondness for the useful arts prompted his celebrated journey to Birmingham in the depth of winter; and whose taste for the Beauties of Nature, even led him to penetrate to the very borders of Wales in the height of summer. This remarkable man would appear to have infused a considerable portion of his restless and inquiring spirit into the breasts of other Members of the Club, and to have awakened in their minds I the same insatiable thirst for travel, which so eminently characterized his own. The whole surface of Middlesex, a part of Surrey; a portion of Essex, and several square miles of Kent, were in their turns examined, and reported on. In a rapid Steamer, they smoothly navigated the placid Thames; and, in an open boat, they fearlessly crossed the turbid Medway. High-roads and byroads, towns and villages, public conveyances and their passengers, first-rate inns and road-side public houses, races, fairs, regattas, elections, meetings, market-days all the scenes that can possibly occur, to enliven a country place, and at which different traits of character may be observed and recognised, were alike visited and beheld by the ardent Pickwick, and his enthusiastic followers.
